

What are examples of impacts for a student Service Design project?

In short: contribution to the field (theoretical impact), organisational, social, environmental, business, personal, career, etc.

A student Service Design project can have many different types of impact. Here a few:

- Contribution to the field: the project has helped create a new method, question a way of working, helped other practitioners.
- Organisational impact: the project has helped an organisation start or make a meaningful change.
- Social impact: the project has helped do good for people, society, a community, etc.
- Environmental impact: the project has helped to do good for the planet or its non human inhabitants
- Business impact: the project has helped an organization improve revenue or reduce cost
- Personal impact: the project has helped the student grow
- career impact: the project has helped the student find his next job or better define his position in the job market.
- etc.

Backstage of this article

This article was illustrated and written by hand on a refurbished Remarkable II tablet. The handwritten text was converted into typed text using the connect service by Remarkable. If you are curious you can download the original note below.