A Great Drink to Start the Day

Consumers recognize that breakfast is a great time for fiber. Their morning fiber occasions are driven by convenience and routine, so it's important to offer them on-the-go portability, as well as nutritional function. The combination of protein and fiber in this option is a real winner. In a recent consumer survey, 62% said they seek to add more fiber to their diet, while 60% reported looking to add more protein.

A successful breakfast shake packed with protein and fiber also needs to nourish consumers' desires for the nutrition and satiety they want—and the great taste they demand.

CHALLENGE:

Adding soy protein to a powdered shake or RTD beverage can create a real challenge when it comes to taste and mouthfeel, since proteins often impart off flavors or have a distinct aftertaste. So, it's important to use ingredients that work in tandem to mask any bitterness and improve the overall taste and mouthfeel.

SOLUTION:

Fibersol® dietary fiber works double time in this high-protein breakfast shake, helping to mask the protein's taste and balance the overall flavor, while it may also support feelings of satiety. This plant-based breakfast drink appeals to a wide range of consumers, including millennials, who particularly appreciate the benefit of plant-based products.

RESULT:

A high-protein breakfast shake—that actually tastes great—and can make this claim: a good source of fiber (5g).

In addition to providing a nutritional advantage, promoting digestive health, and supporting feelings of satiety, find out more about how Fibersol® can help you successfully reduce sugar.

HOW THE LABEL ADDS UP:

Consumers looking for well-rounded nutrition want to see it all on the label, including more protein and dietary fiber. Based on a 2000-calorie diet, daily protein intake should be 50 grams and daily dietary fiber intake should be 25-30 grams a day. With 16g protein and 18% daily value dietary fiber, this great-tasting breakfast shake's label delivers more protein and fiber, and supports feelings of satiety.
